Marina Perez Simão / Tomie Ohtake

Pace is pleased to present coinciding exhibitions of work by artists Marina Perez Simão and Tomie Ohtake in Tokyo this fall. Opening on November 4, these presentations, installed across the first and second floors of Pace's Azabudai Hills gallery, will situate new paintings by Simão in dialogue with works produced by Ohtake—a Japanese-Brazilian artist whose inventive abstractions charted new courses for Modernism in Brazil—between 1963 and 2013. Both exhibitions will be on view during Art Week Tokyo 2025, which runs from November 5 to 9.

For her debut solo exhibition in Japan, Simão—a Brazilian artist renowned for her work in oil painting, watercolor, and printmaking—will unveil a new series of landscape-inspired pieces. Her vibrant, lyrical compositions blur the lines between interior and exterior worlds, guiding viewers through semi-abstract realms filled with organic, flowing forms. Her work reflects a deep engagement with emotion, memory, and place, rendered through a distinctly personal visual language. As part of her process, Simão begins with drawing and watercolor, forging her compositions on canvas after her initial iterations of ideas and forms in these other mediums. Citing Ohtake as a key influence on her practice, she is presenting a solo exhibition at the Instituto Tomie Ohtake in São Paulo through October 19.

The paintings that Simão will show at Pace Tokyo through February 11, 2026 speak to her deep and enduring interest in abstraction's power to convey ideas, concepts, and feelings that transcend language. With these canvases created in 2024 and 2025, the artist has experimented with vertical and horizontal formats to propose new ways of reading space. Defying conventions of landscape painting, she often incorporates multiple horizons in her other-worldly, atmospheric compositions.

Simão's new works are chromatically linked by her use of indigo—an ode to the centuries-old tradition of indigo production in Japan—as well as shades of red and pink. Always unfolding her practice in different directions with each body of work, she has also imbued these dynamic paintings, through palette and gesture, with cosmic luminosity and rhythmic motion. Rendered at multiple scales, Simão's latest compositions are rife with mystery, and they propose new ways of viewing and experiencing landscape.

Pace's simultaneous exhibition of painting and sculpture by Ohtake—which runs through February 11, 2026—will offer a look at the late artist's experimental and radical practice, which she developed during an especially rich and exciting period of Brazilian art history in the 20th century. Born in Kyoto in 1913, Ohtake immigrated to Brazil in 1936 and became one of the country's most celebrated abstractionists. Working across many mediums, including painting, printmaking, and sculpture, the artist brought both formal rigor and an embrace of randomness and surprise to her art. She evoked geological and cosmological phenomena, as well as the vast natural landscapes and topographies of Brazil, through combinations of organic forms and structured geometries in her works. At once ambiguous and multivalent, her abstractions are marked by stately simplicity and freewheeling joy.

The gallery's focused exhibition of Ohtake's work will feature eight paintings and a freestanding, painted steel sculpture. The canvases in the show, which date between 1963 and 2004, chronicle the evolution of the artist's investigations of color, texture, and form. Each composition is a glimpse into some other world—a window into another realm. The 2013 sculpture in the show, a tubular structure that seems to dance before the viewer's eyes, reflects her uncanny ability to imbue simple forms with a sense of continuous, fluid movement. Installed near Pace Tokyo, at the base of the Ark Hills Sengokuyama Mori Tower, Ohtake's monumental yellow ribbon-like outdoor sculpture Infinity is a testament to her enduring impact on public art and urban space.

Together, these exhibitions of work by Simão and Ohtake will present an intergenerational conversation between two artists linked by their heritage and their imaginative approaches to abstraction and landscape painting.
